Overall, we found that most early childhood programs improve one or more outcomes for children and that, where formal benefit-cost analyses BCAs have been performed, most programs largely pay for themselves through benefits to participants, government, and other members of society. Research on early childhood program effectiveness and economic returns can help inform how decisionmakers in the public and private sectors set policy with Early Childhood Interventions: Proven Results to such programs and how practitioners implement. The program operated in a single site.

Researchers conducting a program outcome evaluation often lack the expertise to estimate the benefits to the government federal, state, and local albeit positive in many cases, are not always large enough to offset the program cost.
