All of their memories seem to depend on how they handled the tragedy and, among other things, their interrelationships and the cruelties they inflicted upon each. Their relationships often felt shallow and undeveloped, cruel and too competitive. A superb exploration of memory, lies, and point of view.

I feel this book is less about the investigation into Djuna's disappearance and more about Celia's struggle with self-identity and trying to figure out where she went wrong.

Are you in a book group? I trudged through the thick, and sometimes incomprehensible though the strangest premise is used to set up the book which I like, because if that's accepted, I don't have to accept it at the end when it doesn't make sense Goldberg almost immediately drops into a rundown of Celia's recent history, rather than the realities of her current life—only to summarize those hours more than a chapter later. Refresh and try .
