This is a great article! A person that brings laughter to the workplace will improve productivity and motivation for the whole office as that happy, optimistic outlook is contagious. Ask your team how their weekend was, and check in to see if anyone needs assistance with ongoing projects. And when you have a happy and productive work force that is eager to contribute. Cindy November 19, at 5: With the specter of the recession in the rearview mirror, employees aren't as willing to stay in less-than-desirable working conditions, making it harder for leaders to hold onto the best team members. Include such things as clocking in early, break times, lunch hours. Showing your team you want them to live happy, healthy lifestyles is another example, is it acceptable to clock in early and leave work early?
